Dependent Clause. Dependent clauses are those, which are always incomplete, i.e., they can never stand alone as complete, meaningful sentences. They always depend on the main clause and are joined by conjunctions as well as relative pronouns. They, along with the main clause form a complex sentence. Their existence is for adding meaning to the sentence.

Independent and Dependent Clauses - Differences and Examples

Think of it this way: an independent clause is like a cup of coffee, and a dependent clause is like a caffeine lover. Caffeine lovers are dependent on coffee, so the two can be joined (quite happily) to form a cohesive unit. Similarly, two cups of coffee, or two independent clauses, can be combined.

When you have a group of words that form their own sentence, all by themselves, we call this an independent clause. That means that, first and foremost, it is a complete thought and that it has both a subject and a verb. If it lacks a complete thought, but still has a subject and a verb we call it a dependent clause.
